DURBIN TO THE FRONT

Durbin as a coal shipping terminal is the subject of a long article in the Charleston Gazette of Tuesday. The Interstate Commerce Commission is being asked to make a good freight rate on West Virginia coal to relieve the fuel famine of the New England States, caused by the strike in the anthracite coal region. The logical route for the fine coals of southern West Virginia to the new northern markets is up the Greenbrier Valley on the C. & O. and thence to the Western Maryland at Durbin. The Gazette says in part:

Durbin, a little town in the upper corner of Pocahontas county is destined to be one of the biggest gateways into New England for millions of tons of coal from the Kanawha valley if the interstate commerce commission rules in favor of the requests of scores of people in Massachusetts and other northeastern states who have asked that the commission make it possible for them to get Krnawha splint coals, according to Duncan C. Kennedy, secretary of the Kanawha Coal Operators association. He added that the favorable decision anticipated by New England would probably have a tremendously far reaching effect in southern West tined to be one of the biggest gateget Krnawha splint coals, according to Duncan C.
